Many refugees attempted to carry their personal belongings as they fled, only to be forced to abandon them, realizing there was no space for anything but their shattered dreams.

These dreams, buried deep within their travel kits, remained too difficult to let go of, leaving them stranded in this desolate wasteland, buried out here amongst the very tac team from the grassy knoll, here in this dead, desert wasteland that surround what was once Fort Hood.

Colonel Larry muttered a hasty command to ignore the temperature gauge as our aging AMC Gremlin sputtered and clunked its way down the road, the fuel gauge ominously hovering near empty.
Meanwhile, the radio emitted a comical yet unsettling message, likely a pre-recorded broadcast left on loop by the station staff who had abandoned their posts.
The transmission, seemingly cobbled together from vintage Emergency Broadcast System alerts from the Cold War era, delivered a stark directive: leave behind everything that cannot be carried.

I abandoned my cherished lifetime collection of personal treasures and left a lengthy postcard on the front porch of my rented home for anyone who might come across it.
In truth, it resembled more of a meandering manifesto than a simple note, centered around a point I felt compelled to express about cultural icons—though the specifics now elude me. It’s intriguing how one's thoughts can shift when faced with the decision to leave behind everything painstakingly gathered over the years, isn’t it?
In the end, I realize that everything is merely lost among the ashes of forgotten thoughts, remnants of fleeting desires once acquired from the local Dollar Store.

I recall the old man's words:
"Desire surely will become illusions the further you move on."
The truth eludes us here, destined to be debated by future historians who will pen papers and build careers around it—this is precisely why I chose to leave it behind.
What remains is nothing but a collection of worn-out, discarded remnants no different than what was left by others along the roadside, devoid of meaning or value.
A mile or so from the spot where our aging AMC Gremlin sputtered to a halt, starved for fuel and lacking a proper radiator cap, stood a gas station that had long since lost its purpose.

The door, once a gateway to service, had vanished, leaving the old structure to decay in solitude.
Time had not been kind; the broken locks, now rusted, hinted at years of abandonment. Inside, remnants of the past lay scattered across the floor, a chaotic mix of debris and forgotten items, all contributing to a foul odor that had only intensified with time.
A biting north-west wind swept through the station's shattered window, partially obscured by a sign that read, “Cash Sales ONLY!”
Nowadays, a north-west wind is a serious matter, as it carries the chill from the desolate lands we once fondly referred to as our Great Plains Homestead.

Any sensible traveler would hasten to find shelter upon spotting storm clouds gathering on the northern horizon, for the impending rains could bring a dangerous cocktail of heavy metals, mingled with a noxious, tar-like substance, resembling radioactive droplets from the sky.
Dang!
We had better go find shelter as that storm is coming quick!
